Together with Mr. Allen Dulles, I had breakfast today with General Persons and Mr. Jack Anderson for the purpose of discussing the possibility of legislation at this session of Congress to amend the Communications Act permitting diplomatic missions in Washington, on a reciprocal basis, to operate radio transmitters.

General Persons informed us that he had canvassed the situation again and had found the atmosphere unfavorable to the passage of this legislation at the present session. He had consulted, among others, Messrs. Rayburn, Martin and Knowland. While believing that there would be little or no difficulty with people like Owen Harris (House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee) or with people such as Senator Magnuson, it would be impossible to have legislation of this character slip through without floor debate. General Persons thought that it would be a distinct risk, that some of the less responsible elements up for reelection this year would try to gain publicity for themselves in a way that would damage chances of passage of the legislation. Conceivable harm to our international relations might also be provoked. It would be difficult in the legislation to distinguish as between certain countries and others.

General Persons and Mr. Anderson are fully aware of the difficulties involved. We emphasized again the successful manner in which General Persons declared himself in agreement. We discussed the possibility that the Federal Communications Commission might conceivably raise the issue; that a violation of American law is involved. Mr. Dulles referred to diplomatic immunity and the right of the diplomatic mission to communicate with its government.

General Persons agreed to canvass the situation further in Congress.
